Synopsis

Act I

The Amazon rainforest, the early 1900s. Passengers aboard the steamboat El Dorado are traveling to hear the legendary opera singer Florencia Grimaldi sing at the reopening of the theater in Manaus. Riolobo, a mystical character who can assume many forms, introduces the embarking passengers: Paula and Alvaro, a middle-aged couple attempting to rekindle their marriage; Rosalba, a journalist researching a biography on Grimaldi; and Florencia herself, traveling alone and incognito, harboring a burning desire to find her long-lost lover Cristóbal, a butterfly hunter, whose love unlocked her staggering powers of musical expression.

Once en route, Rosalba accidentally drops her research notes overboard. The captain's nephew, Arcadio, rescues them, and the pair become aware of a strong mutual attraction. The evening concludes as Paula and Alvaro's attempt at a romantic dinner dissolves into a bitter quarrel. The captain, who initially appears unaware of Florencia's identity, tells her of the fate of Cristóbal, who disappeared in the jungle, thus throwing her dearest ambition into question. A heated card game brings out the contrasting sexual and hostile tensions between Rosalba and Arcadio and Paula and Alvaro, until the afternoon dissolves into a violent storm. Trying to save the ship, Alvaro is swept overboard. The captain is knocked unconscious, and despite Arcadio's efforts at the helm, the ship runs aground.

Intermission (AT APPROXIMATELY 9:00PM)

Act II

In the aftermath of the accident, Florencia questions if she is alive or dead, Rosalba and Arcadio renounce the love developing between them, and Paula mourns the loss of Alvaro, realizing that it was pride—not lack of love—that stood between them. Riolobo appears again mysteriously to return Alvaro to the ship, claiming that Paula's laments saved him from death. Rosalba, distraught that her notebook has been ruined in the storm, talks to the incognito Florencia about her research. During the ensuing discussion, Florencia declares passionately that Grimaldi's gift was a result of her love for Cristóbal. Rosalba realizes that she is talking to her heroine and, hearing her story, decides that her own love for Arcadio shouldn't be suppressed. To Rosalba's joy and relief, Arcadio reciprocates her feelings. Paula and Alvaro have also rediscovered their joy and love for each other.

El Dorado reaches Manaus at last; however, the passengers learn that cholera has struck the town. Florencia laments her loss of Cristóbal, and as she dreams of finding him, her spirit drifts towards his in a mystical transformation.

Daniel Catán / Libretto by Marcela Fuentes-Berain

Florencia en el Amazonas

Premiere: Houston Grand Opera, 1996

Fluidity—of time, place, emotion, and even of identity—is at the core of Florencia en el Amazonas. It is ostensibly the tale of passengers traveling down the Amazon River aboard the steamship El Dorado, connected by the enigmatic Riolobo, an intermediary between people and dimensions whom Catán perceived as his own stand-in among the cast. The real drama, though lies in the psychological journeys that each character undertakes. The libretto, by Marcela Fuentes-Berain, is an original story rich in allusion to other tales that skirt the border between drama and fantasy. Fuentes-Berain was a student of Gabriel García Márquez, whose style of magical realism (particularly in the great novel Love in the Time of Cholera) informs this story. The overall effect is much like the world it depicts, geographically (the Amazon) and emotionally (the search for love and fulfillment), utterly seductive yet with a danger lying just beneath its beautiful surface.

The Creators

Hailing from Mexico City, Daniel Catán (1949–2011) was a celebrated composer of orchestral, instrumental, vocal, and film music. Among his other operas are La Hija de Rappaccini (1991) and Il Postino (2010). The libretto is by Marcela Fuentes-Berain (b. 1955), a noted Mexican screenwriter and educator.

The Setting

The opera is set in the first years of the 20th century aboard a riverboat sailing through the Amazon River Basin. The name “el Amazonas” refers to the southernmost department, or state, in Colombia, as well as to the neighboring state across the border in Brazil (“o Amazonas” in Portuguese), of which Manaus is the capital.

The Music

Catán’s score is clearly and unabashedly romantic, reveling in luxuriant beauty and lush evocations of the natural world. The orchestra provides the basis for the flexibility between stylistic boundaries: sharp-edged conversation morphs seamlessly into expansive dream-like music that paints a portrait of the river; the turbulent storm in Act I emerges from casual chatter and subsides back into it. Riolobo, a baritone, is the character primarily responsible for negotiating the changes between reality and fantasy throughout the opera, especially in the finale of Act I, when he “calms the storm” by addressing the river gods directly. His mythic identity “rises up” within his everyday character and bursts boundaries, an effect clearly discernible in the music depicting him and his world’s mutability. While the title character is undoubtedly the “prima donna” role, the second soprano in the cast, Rosalba, also has moving vocal solos reminiscent of Puccini, none more powerful than when she finally gives in to her feelings for Arcadio toward the end of Act II. The opera’s climax belongs to Florencia, who is transformed into a butterfly as her spirit transcends the human realm—recalling Wagner’s Isolde and her soaring Liebestod (“love-death”).

Met History

Only the third Spanish-language opera ever presented on the Met stage—following Granados’s Goyescas in 1916 and de Falla’s La Vida Breve in 1926—Florencia en el Amazonas has its company premiere this season. Music Director Yannick Nézet-Séguin conducts a new production by Mary Zimmerman that stars Ailyn Pérez in the title role, alongside Gabriella Reyes, Nancy Fabiola Herrera, Mario Chang, Michael Chioldi, Mattia Olivieri, and Greer Grimsley.

Program Note

Critical responses to Daniel Catán's Florencia en el Amazonas often compare the opera to the music of another composer. At the top of the list for frequency of reference are Puccini, Debussy, Stravinsky, and Strauss. But there are also outliers: Satie, Britten, Verdi, Michael Nyman, Copland, and any type of "Hollywood Voyager Music." Catán himself did not downplay the influence that all kinds of music had on his work, especially during his travels and the 14 years he lived abroad:

It opened my eyes to the infinitely varied world of music, well beyond the confines of the piano. London seemed to me like the center of the music world. I heard Petroushka and the St. Matthew Passion, The Rite of Spring and Beethoven's string quartets; I saw operas by Mozart, Wagner, Strauss, and a memorable Oedipus Rex by Stravinsky at the old Sadler's Wells Theatre that haunts me to this day.

The critics are not necessarily wrong; a lifetime of accrued musical memories always lurks in the shadows of the listening experience, no less so than in the ear of the composer. Florencia en el Amazonas operates on two intertwining musical planes. The first is traditional: the soundscape of Florencia Grimaldi, an opera singer, whose soaring vocal lines and rich Puccini-esque harmonies unfold in distinct arias, duets, ensembles, and choruses. She is on a mission to revisit her musical roots in Manaus, a large city deep in the Amazon rainforest that does, indeed, have an elegant, European-style opera house. The beautiful Teatro Amazonas took more than 15 years to build and opened with a performance of Ponchielli's La Gioconda. In his fascinating account of an Amazonian adventure, The Lost City of Z, David Grann describes the edifice as an "[extravagance], with its Italian marble, Bohemian glass, gilded balconies, [and] chandeliers."

Catán's second musical track is atmospheric and descriptive: haunting orchestral interludes and modernistic lines immerse listeners in sounds of the jungle. Nature reveals itself in unprepared dissonances, swooping harp glissandi, quivering strings, and edgy winds and brass, as the occasional dance rhythms of the marimba and the West African djembe mimic creatures of the night "singing" to their mates. In his essay "On How I Found Florencia and Got to the Amazon," Catán described his musical goals: "Every thought, every image of the Amazon, suggested timbres, rhythms, melodies." An instrumental meditation on nature in all of its beauty, mystery, and terror thus intersects with the "facts" of conventional opera. If Catán alludes to another composer in this context, it is surely Bartók, whose "Night Music" style is evoked by the sounds of insects, animals, and undulating waters liberated by the darkness from human noise.

Florencia and her fellow travelers undertake their Amazonian journey from Leticia, Colombia, to Manaus, Brazil, at great risk. The Amazon River, at 3,977 miles, meanders through dense jungle inhabited by snakes, piranhas, electric eels, giant centipedes, tarantulas, poison dart frogs, pit vipers, spiders, and, of course, mosquitoes. There are numerous poisonous plants, including the strychnos and a cannonball tree that can drop its exploding fruit on unaware passersby. But danger has always seduced the explorers, opportunists, seekers, and dreamers of fiction and nonfiction: Fitzcarraldo, film director Werner Herzog's early-20th-century would-be rubber baron and obsessive opera lover who insisted that a steamship be hoisted over a mountain to facilitate the construction of an opera house in the jungle; Percy Fawcett, a British explorer, whose quest for the ruins of an ancient but advanced civilization was recounted by Grann (Fawcett, like Florencia's lost love, Cristóbal, disappeared into the Brazilian jungle); and, finally, the iconic Indiana Jones, who searched for the crystal skull of Akator, a pseudonym for the lost city of gold, El Dorado, not coincidentally the name of the ship that takes Florencia to Manaus.

Catán and his librettist, Marcela Fuentes-Berain, dedicated their work "In Homage to Gabriel García Márquez," the Nobel Prize-winning author of Love in the Time of Cholera, a loose inspiration for the opera's story. Márquez was known for the magical realism of his novels, which Catán's widow, Andrea Puente-Catán, described as when fantastical things happen in people's lives. For Latin Americans, it's like those magical moments are integrated into the way we live. [For example], my aunt died, and three days after, I suddenly found her little box with threads and needles and pins on the stairs of my house—yes, this actually happened! Instead of me saying, "Maybe this dropped from a bag," I said, "Oh, my Niña came to visit and left me this box just to remind me that she's still around."

Florencia en el Amazonas embodies "magical realism" at its core. While Fuentes-Berain's libretto is steeped in Amazonian mythos, it is, at the same time, securely bound to material existence. At the most fundamental level is the journey itself: To those living in the early 1900s, a riverboat would be a common means of transportation. In the 21st century, with our extensive network of personal and public transportation, such an excursion would seem like a novelty. In actuality, while a native or experienced guide could surely travel the backroads on foot or in an all-terrain vehicle, for the average person, the only direct way remains by boat—a journey of about three and a half days. The libretto lays out Florencia's journey in a precise timeline: The first five scenes take place in the morning, afternoon, and evening of the first day. Scene 6 begins on the second day, which continues across the intermission into Scene 11. Scene 12 takes place at dawn on the third day and continues into the afternoon, when the opera ends.

References to real places and things abound: the "grains, fruits, vegetables; powders and oils; opals, emeralds, and silver" hawked by vendors on the dock in Leticia; Florencia has canceled performances at La Scala in order to undertake this voyage; engine pressure reads "102," and the ship moves at a speed of "one or two knots"; a card game features an ace of hearts, three of spades, queen of diamonds, and six of clubs; Arcadio longs to see "London, Tahiti, Sierra Nevada ... the snows of Everest, the plains of Argentina, [and] the African sun;" Paula and Alvaro dine on iguana and sip rosé, but they fight and throw their wedding rings into the bottom of a Champagne bottle; the Captain recalls the specificity of Cristóbal's mission to find the "rarest butterfly in the world, the Emerald Muse"; several characters are even named for natural phenomena—Rosalba ("the rosy dawn"), Arcadio ("the pristine forest"), Riolobo ("river wolf"), and finally, Florencia ("flowering" or "blooming").

But the comfortably mundane and the pastoral are breached by an apocalyptic conclusion to Act I: In a surreal and violent storm, lightning bolts strike the ship as "cherry-colored droplets of rain fall on the Captain's white uniform." The Captain does not so much as blink at the stains on his clothing; he is only surprised that there is lightning "in a dry month." He pleads with the "Amazons of the river" to "guide his hand" as the enigmatic Riolobo beseeches the Amazons not to "destroy the world." An offstage chorus echoes his entreaty. The "magical realism" of the libretto is reflected in Catán's bifurcated musical choices: The conventional melodies and structures of opera live beside and within the sonorities of the wild.

This primal space opens the mind and heart to rebirth and acceptance. Alvaro performs a heroic deed and recaptures Paula's affection; Rosalba, the single-minded careerist, is transformed by the ravages of the storm and accepts Arcadio's love. But it is Florencia who best understands the magic of reality: "Hear me, Cristóbal. My voice soars toward you and spreads its wings, sheltering the world's love. My voice was born in you, from your hands, which asleep or awake, dream of wondrous butterflies."

Daniel Catán

COMPOSER (MEXICO CITY, MEXICO)

CAREER HIGHLIGHTS The music of Daniel Catán is among the most significant and best loved of any composers in the 21st century. Known principally as a composer of operas, his oeuvre also spans works for orchestra, chamber music, and art song, as well as music for film and television, music theater, and even traditional Latin pop. He studied philosophy at the University of Sussex in England before enrolling in Princeton University as a PhD student in composition under Milton Babbitt, James Randall, and Benjamin Boretz. His opera La Hija de Rappaccini, which appeared at San Diego Opera in 1994, was the first opera by a Mexican composer ever produced by a professional opera company in the United States, while Florencia en el Amazonas was the first opera in Spanish commissioned by a major American company and premiered at Houston Grand Opera in 1996. The success of this opera led to the commission of Salsipuedes for Houston Grand Opera, and his fourth opera, Il Postino, was commissioned by LA Opera and also appeared in Vienna and Paris. At the time of his death in 2011, he was at work on his next opera, Meet John Doe.

Marcela Fuentes-Berain

LIBRETTIST (MEXICO CITY, MEXICO)

CAREER HIGHLIGHTS Having studied with celebrated novelist Gabriel García Márquez, she provided the libretto for the world premiere of Florencia en el Amazonas at Houston Grand Opera in 1996. Her work has also appeared extensively across film, television, radio, and theater. Her screenplays include Mexican Spanish productions La Hija del Caníbal, starring Cecilia Roth, Hasta Morir, and Ciudad de Ciegos and Colombian director Víctor Gaviria's Sumas y Restas, winner of Best Movie at the Cartagena Film Festival and Best Foreign Film by the Mexican Academy of Film Arts and Sciences. She also collaborated with director Tony Scott on Man on Fire, starring Denzel Washington. She has served as a script consultant for the Sundance Institute for more than 20 years, a member of the selection committee of Spain's Huelva Ibero-American Film Festival since 2001, and as part of Mexico's Bicentennial Film Committee in 2010. She is a member of Mexican Academy of Cinematographic Arts and was part of Proimágenes Colombia evaluating movie projects. A pioneer and founder of the prestigious Bolivia Lab and an esteemed educator, she has been a teacher and advisor in many important Latin American films and books.
